PRIMATE OF IRELAND DIES VERY SUDDENLY

Cardinal Michael Logue Passes
Away at Home—Public
Not Warned of Illness.

BELFAST, Nov. 19.—Cardinal Michael Logue, Primate of all Ireland, died today at his residence, Ara Coeli in Armagh, without the public having received any intimation that he was ill.

Cardinal Michael Logue, venerable Archbishop of Armagh and Primate of All Ireland, "the successor of St. Patrick," strove for Irish tranquility and peace. The guerrilla tactics of Sinn Fein sympathizers and the reprisals of the Black and Tans filled him with horror and evoked strong pastoral letters denouncing the crimes which, in 1920, brought Ireland to the verge of civil war. Exhorting the people to prayer and to avoid all associations leading to crime and disaster, the Cardinal in November of that year charged that "the activities of the British military authorities are being carried into districts which hitherto have been considered peaceful." He concluded: "God help our country, moaning under this competition in murder." The calamities in Ireland, he declared, were greater than in the memory of any living man.

Cardinal Logue was physically small, with grey hair, ruddy face and blue eyes and was vigorous and energetic despite his eighty years. He denounced the attempt on the life of Viscount French, the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, in 1919 and said that the shooting of the police was "plain murder." When conditions became critical he forbade political meetings; later he received a warning threatening his life.

The Cardinal paid a visit to the United States in 1908, at the time of the centenary celebration of the founding of the Roman Catholic archdiocese of New York. He celebrated pontifical mass in St. Patrick's Cathedral in a $6,000 vestment and later was the guest of President Roosevelt whom he greatly admired. Before returning home he placed a wreath on the tomb of Washington at Mt. Vernon. He also met Andrew Carnegie and John D. Rockefeller and in a public statement praised them for their philanthropies.
